THE WAY of BLACKHAWK

CAPTAIN JOHROH, once favored of the Mikado, stood in full uniform before his military judges. Johroh was twice the size of any dwarfed yellow officer there; even among white men he would be a giant. Under his tunic swelled huge hummocks of meaty muscle, his neck was thick, his shaven skull heavy, his slant eyes sunk like rifle-pits.

"Captain Johroh," said Colonel Sigura, head of the court martial, "you are guilty of theft and false reports of goods trusted to you in the Burmese field conflict. For such crimes, in time of war, an officer may be executed."

"I was hungry," mumbled the big captain. "My body needs more food than smaller men——"

"And you took rations that should have fed six soldiers, gulping them yourself," broke in the colonel coldly. "Food was scarce, and several men were undernourished—a position was poorly guarded, and fell to the enemy. For that, too, you could be sentenced to die miserably."

"I can only say——" began Captain Johroh.

"Say nothing," bade Colonel Sigura. "Because you shall have one more chance." He pushed forward a paper covered with Japanese characters. "This assigns you to Fort Kara, in the heart of captured Manila. At Fort Kara there is an experimental shop where the newest and most terrible of rapid-fire air cannon will be built. Only one set of plans exists, and is guarded there."

"I am to keep them safe?" asked Johroh eagerly. "Easily done, sir."

"Perhaps," nodded the colonel coldly. "It so happens that we have news from our spies—Blackhawk himself has sworn to seize those plans and let his allies use them."

"Blackhawk!" The name was chorused forth in absolute horror from those who heard it. Only Johroh grinned.

"I will baffle him, honorable sirs," he promised.

"Then do so," commanded Colonel Sigura. "Once every twenty-four hours I myself shall visit Fort Kara. If the plans are gone at any time, you shall die—at once—without further trial—and by the most dreadful of tortures."

* * *

Fort Kara did not look like most forts. Indeed, it looked like hardly anything—from ground level. Only a single round turret protruded, in an area of Manila long ago laid bare of buildings by intensive bombings and shell fire. No brick, stone or clod was left there, and constant work with hoe and rake kept it bare even of grass. The turret itself was no taller than a man, no wider than a barrel, and made of double-strength steel and concrete. It was topped by a periscope and sensitive sound detectors. Captain Johroh strode up to its door, where a sentry stood with fixed bayonet.

"No entry, honorable officer," hissed the sentry.

"I am the new commander," growled back Captain Johroh, and held out his commission. "Admit me, and fasten the door behind me."

The sentry came to a salute. The captain passed inside. An iron ladder showed the way to Fort Kara's hidden depths. As he swung down, he heard the upper doorway clang.

But he had no time to think of what lay behind and above. On the level below was a second sentry, a pistol ready in his hand. "You have permission to come here?" he challenged.

"Fool, I am he who gives permissions," snarled the captain, thrusting forward his order sheet. "Cease your questions, summon the second-in-command with the plans we guard. Quickly!"

The sentry saluted, and turned to a telephone. Within seconds a dapper lieutenant scampered into view, a rolled set of blueprints under his arm.

"Captain Johroh?" he smiled. "We are honored to——"

"Silence, and give me the prints. Which way lie my quarters?" Johroh turned in the direction the lieutenant indicated. "See that the door is kept locked behind me. Let nobody enter without permission. Uunderstand?"

He tramped away, and again a door clanged behind him. Johroh grinned to himself. The fort was of massive steel and concrete. Each door was of threefold plating, with a huge and complex lock that could not be opened, save from inside. Let Blackhawk, even Blackhawk the terrible, storm this line of portals and armed guards! He went down a corridor to the door marked "Commander." Yet another soldier was on guard.

"Your credentials, honorable sir?" said this one.

"Here, you donkey!" fumed Johroh, tired of repeated challenges. "Read this commission, if you have the eyes and the wit. Then let me into my private quarters. Close the door behind me, admit none except by my orders. Is that clear?"

Once more a salute, a stepping aside, an open door. Johroh entered, heard the door clang and the lock click.

He looked around a private room, comfortable, adequate—with no means of entry except for the door. Beyond that, guarded halls and portals, all the way to the ground level. Johroh felt relief.

Here he was, and here he would stay. The plans for the rapid-fire gun would stay, too. When the experts must consult them, they would come to him. He himself would be the only keeper, here alone and safe. . . .

MILITARY COMICS

"Ah, Captain," murmured a gentle voice at his shoulder, "isn't it cozy here, just the two of us locked in?"

Johroh turned, glaring.

A tall, smiling figure stood there, bowing—a figure with a yellow face, slant eyes, the uniform of a Japanese private. In one hand the private held a big suitcase, over the other arm was draped an overcoat. But Johroh, who had seen and feared many photographs of a certain face suddenly realized that the yellow pigment was a stain, the slant eyes made so by adhesive tape, and that the disguised features were those of—

"Blackhawk!" he gasped, and lunged for the telephone on the wall.

Blackhawk set down the suitcase, dropped the coat upon it, and moved quicker than Johroh. One hand shoved the big captain across the room into a corner. The other caught the phone and wrenched it from the wall.

Johroh opened his mouth to yell. But Blackhawk had leaped back across the room to him. A sudden smashing uppercut dropped Johroh like a sack of meal, and he knew no more.

When senses returned, he lay bound on the cot. Blackhawk had stripped away his uniform, was putting it on.

"Yell now if you wish," he told Johroh. "Imitating your voice, I ordered the sentry outside to leave his post."

"You — y o u — " Johroh stammered. "How did you get in here?"

"The sentries admitted you. Of course, your servant could enter behind you."

"I have no servant!" protested Johroh. "I decided that I could trust nobody—"

"Naturally, your new command at Fort Kara did not know that. I got word of your appointment, and assumed appropriate disguise. Now, changing myself to look like you—after all, the sentries have seen you only once, and I am an expert at make-up—I shall depart. And these," he added, holding up the roll of plans, "go with me. To the experts of the Allied Nations."

Johroh strained at his bonds. "Blackhawk, I know you will not turn back from this. And that nobody can stop you now. But do one thing for me. Draw that pistol you have taken from me and blow out my brains."

Blackhawk smiled again. "And help you to commit harikiri? No, Johroh. I give you your life."

He walked out and away.

Johroh lay alone and helpless. But he knew it would not be for long. Only an hour or two at most, and Colonel Sigura would arrive—to find the plans gone—and to sentence Johroh to a death of torture.

U.S. MARINES RAID JAP HELD ISLAND

In one of the largest Marine assault forces ever assembled for a landing operation was platoon Sgt. Harry Tully, the first enlisted man to be mentioned in Marine Corps dispatches from this island battlefield, where the Japs had their main seaplane base. Sgt. Tully led his platoon ashore in the first wave. His commanding officer was shot and his friends were killed all around him.

For two days they filtered through the island and hunted the Japs through the jungle and into caves, from out of trees and off of cliffs. When it was over, the victorious Marines had killed 2000 Japanese in the fiercest kind of fighting in which not a single Jap surrendered!

AS DAWN BREAKS OVER GAVATU, THEIR SOUTH SEA ISLAND OBJECTIVE, AN AMERICAN ARMADA MOVES OVER THE HORIZON AND THE ESCORTING BATTLESHIPS' GUNS START BOMBARDING AT 6:17 AM.
